March in Berlin to demand the freedom of Western Sahara.

It is eight o'clock in the morning, Brandenburg Gate, three Saharans battered by the inclement European cold are waiting for the company that must set up the infrastructure of a stage. Taleb's phone does not stop ringing, it is impossible for him to finish the coffee with which he seeks to regain some temperature. The company does not arrive at the agreed time and more and more compatriots call to find out which train they should take to go to Alexander Platz. German is not a familiar language for us, it bears little resemblance to our two mother tongues: Spanish and Arabic.

The minutes run as fast as gusts of icy wind ready to become one more difficulty for us. It does not matter, we belong to a people used to difficulties. Soon compatriots begin to arrive, the first SADR flags appear at the bottom of a long avenue witnessing historical limits: the fall of the empire, the fall of the Weimar Republic, the rise of Nazi barbarism and the victorious entry of the armies liberators of the Soviet Union. And, above all, of the famous Berlin conference where the lands of our Africa were distributed among the European powers. In that appointment in history, our people, accustomed to the freedom and independence of the desert, were assigned to Spain without any consultation, consent or explicit or tacit desire.

As if it were a messianic prediction, the descendants of those men and women, whose future was determined by decree in a European capital, return to the same place. I am not able to find out what each one feels or thinks about the meaning of this place. This enters a more emotional sphere and, therefore, more complex to measure under objective parameters. The only thing I can count on is what I felt, although with this I may fall into the perception bias from which the objective scientific method flees.

There are hugs, long, warm greetings, smiles, raised fists, and spontaneous chants. There is a general feeling of drunkenness and happiness, but here there is no alcohol and no one drinks, we are of Muslim tradition. However, the feeling of happiness and camaraderie is complete. As more compatriots and friends of the cause arrive from different parts of Europe, the excitement increases even more if possible. They are thousands of kilometers traveled, many have spent the night in buses, cars or waiting at an airport, but fatigue does not seem to have made a dent.

The police authorize us to connect the sound, the Saharawi songs begin to sound, revolutionary songs of the Italian partisans, of revolutionary Cuba, a melting pot of the best artistic tradition of liberating causes. The meteorological hostility in the form of a glacial wind seems to have disappeared and no, the thermometer has not lowered and the clouds have not allowed the sun to warm us. The fervor makes its effect among the masses, men and women full of joy and revolutionary passion shout like never before SAHARA LIBERTA! POLISARIO WILL WIN!

The curious arrive soon, in different languages we try to explain the story to them. Their faces express surprises and gestures of solidarity towards our cause. Some Moroccan approaches, tries to argue, cannot, they have no arguments, insults and we dispatch him with a brief but hurtful “congratulations on your wedding to Israel, enjoy the dowry.”

Palestinians, Syrians, Sudanese, Chileans exiled after the fascist coup, Algerian brothers, remain with us. While the Moroccan rats are marginalized and isolated, we are totally supported by all the freedom fighters. The compatriots who come from Brussels bring a Jaima. The house of the Saharans is built in the center of Berlin and, as the best tradition of hospitality dictates, all of our friends, comrades in struggle, are invited to it.

As Commander Che Guevara said “solidarity is the tenderness of the peoples” and this time, the Saharans in Berlin felt a lot of solidarity, German friends from the DIE LINKE party have been with us from the first moment, the Foreign United Left made itself available and Nerea, her representative for Europe, worked for this act as if her life were running out of it. The victory of our people is certain, but above all it will be beautiful because it is not the result of the effort of a nation, an ethnic group or an identity idea. It will be the result of a collective effort based on solidarity and the noblest ideas that unite people from all corners of the world.
